Does not the personal liberty bill look directly-certainly to the maintenance of this position? Can there be doubts as to this point in his own mind? Is it not the life and oul of the bill? Yet all such state action as this, the supreme court has pronounced null and void.

Again: the legislature that passed the bill, have declared, also, that the fugitive slave law is unconstitutional; that it is, of course, no law, is null and and this bill looks to the maintenance of this losition. We pass by the great, inherent, inalienahe reserved rights of revolution which the people of Massachusetts have, and which is civil war; but ask, has the State a "clear and constitutional" right peaceably annul a law of Congress which it may renounce unconstitutional? The governor, in his "8 of the act of 1850, that "the large majority of jurists and statesmen of the republic had prounced it constitutional." Now this personal liberbill looks to thoroughly annulling this act of 1850. Governor Gardner prepared to sanction this? Is a" clear and constitutional" right of this State to
